For Immediate Release

Detroit, Mich. – The City of Detroit, its infrastructure and residents have been relentlessly portrayed in the media as gritty, crumbling, and troubled, yet determined to survive. “The Great Detroit” is a new documentary that showcases the best the area has to offer, presenting a panoramic examination of Detroit’s history, landscape, people, and events while underscoring the positives all around.

The MSU Detroit Center is hosting a free viewing of the film on Friday, October 10, 6:30-8:30 p.m., followed by a question and answer session with the director, Anthony Brogdon.

University Outreach and Engagement

Brogdon is a native Detroiter, a graduate of Detroit Public Schools, and an independent filmmaker new to the business. He chose “The Great Detroit” as his inaugural project, aiming to make it “100% positive.”

The documentary features more than 50 interviews, and highlights businesses, parks, neighborhoods, the riverfront, social services, religion, arts and culture, music, education, and technological advances.
